Q3 2025 Fund Commentary

Market Commentary

Positive corporate earnings, resilient economic growth and falling interest rates helped propel stock and bond markets up during the period. Despite sharply negative reaction to U.S. tariffs in April, the risks of a tariff-induced recession and spike in inflation appear to have failed to come to pass.

Performance

The Fund's relative exposure to Taiwan Semiconductor Manufacturing Co. Ltd. (TSMC), ASML Holding NV and Tencent Holdings Ltd. contributed to performance. TSMC and ASML Holding performed well because of demand for artificial intelligence (AI). Tencent stock rose because of optimism and results, with management crediting AI in driving better return on investment for advertisers on its platforms.

Relative exposure to RELX PLC, Wolters Kluwer NV, Deutsche Boerse AG and London Stock Exchange Group PLC detracted from performance. These software holdings were affected by AI-related concerns. Some of their competitive advantages stem from specialized, often proprietary data and analytics. Investors had concerns that AI may lower the barriers to entry for new service providers or lower their pricing power.

At a sector level, security selection in communication services contributed to performance. Stock selection in financials and industrials detracted from performance.

Portfolio Activity

Rakus Co. Ltd. was added based on its localized knowledge and expertise coupled with labour- and cost-saving initiatives. King Slide Works Co. Ltd., whose rail kits are used in AI servers, was added for its historic return on capital and high, stable margins. The sub-advisor added Hikari Tsushin Inc. for its low valuation given that its core operating business is highly cash generative and low in capital intensity.

Schneider Electric SE was increased when its share price fell. However, the sub-advisor sees the company's lower-margin project work as positive for the long-term, higher-margin replacement demand. TSMC and RELX were sold to manage the Fund's exposures.

Outlook

Financial markets are booming. The rise in the price of gold, typically associated with periods of apprehension, accompanied narrowing credit spreads and new highs for equity markets. Even a decline in the U.S. dollar doesn't seem to have bothered investors globally.

After a decade of concern about under-investment, it is now an era of massive capital expenditures. Estimates for corporate spending on data centre infrastructure and semiconductors are projected to be several trillion dollars over the next three years. Since November 2022, AI-related stocks account for 90% of capital spending growth, 80% of earnings growth and 75% of S&P 500 Index returns.

Counsel International Growth Series F

The question is how these investments will be funded and when the return on investment will take place. Many technology giants making capital expenditures are cash generative, but governments are getting involved given strategic imperatives and the long-term potential of AI. However, history reveals that periods of rapid investment can invite excess. While the current enthusiasm for AI infrastructure is grounded in real technological progress, the path from investment to returns is rarely smooth or predictable.

The sub-advisor is focused on fundamentals, preferring companies with competitive advantages, prudent balance sheets and the ability to generate sustainable cash flows. While the sub-advisor is attentive to new opportunities, they are mindful of the risks that can emerge when optimism runs high.
